The new feature enables players to pick and choose from 20 animations, such as bending their legs, feinting or shooting with their instep. With this new feature, FIFA will naturally become more realistic, more sports-like in terms of its physical interpretation, and adding an extra dimension to the gameplay. Physical style is what FIFA is all about That has been the driving factor behind the transition to this new technology, according to Demichelis. "It offers us more animation possibilities, and we're adding an additional layer of authenticity to the game, by allowing players to express themselves much more naturally than ever before. "Real-life movements are recorded using motion capture data, and we apply that motion data to the animation. "For example, bending your legs or shooting a through-ball. A lot of sports games use a combination of in-game graphics, and animation, but we've tried to create something that is as authentic as possible. "The data helps us understand the individual characteristics of players, and add them into the game in a meaningful way. We've really pushed the envelope to make it as authentic as possible, it's physically driven." HyperMotion Technology is part of the FIFA 2K series. Demichelis said they will be looking at this new technology in more detail in a future iteration. But in the meantime, the dedicated FIFA development team are working on FIFA 22 to enhance the game in all aspects. "FIFA is a game that is constantly evolving. We're always testing and improving the experience for our fans and our players." The game will include a slew of improvements according to Demichelis. "It's not just graphics, everything is improved," he said. "Some of the player behaviour is improved, for example, a goalkeeper running forward and kicking the ball to start a counter-attack. "We're adding a new brand of ball physics, so we've improved the interaction between the ball and the environment. In FIFA 11, the ball was always going through the same things. It was always the same. "Now it has different characteristics. We've improved the ball rotation. It gives the player different options to use the ball in different situations. It's more varied now.

Every year we try to improve upon the in-depth realism and excitement of gameplay while continuing to push the limits of football entertainment. View More Sports Games1. Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to an information processing apparatus and an information processing method and, in particular, to an information processing apparatus and an information processing method for acquiring an image. 2. Description of the Related Art Recent years have witnessed the advent of various information processing systems that recognize human activity. The information processing systems can recognize human activity when the human activity is an action of pressing a button, pressing a mouse, or the like. There is known a technique for recognizing the human action by monitoring a motion captured image or a body image. Some of the information processing systems automatically execute an instruction that has been registered in advance by a user. Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 11-204326 discusses a technique for detecting a movement that occurs in a detected portion of a human image and determining the movement to be an instruction. By using this technique, the information processing system can automatically execute an instruction that has been registered in advance by the user. However, with the technique discussed in Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 11-204326, a misrecognition of action occurs in a case where an input device is placed on a user and an instruction that is to be recognized is given via the input device. More specifically, when the user moves an input device away from the user to some degree, the input device does not output the instruction that has been input via the input device. In a case where the instruction is input via the input device and the user executes the instruction by pressing a button of the input device, the user cannot confirm the result of the instruction while the user is making a motion with respect to the button. As a result, the user cannot confirm the result of the instruction until the user has stopped moving with respect to the button. Don't have an account with us?
